Republic and Democracy. What are they?
And what is the relationship that binds them?

Democracy is defined as that societal order in which the People rise as the Sovereign and give life to a Republic: a national co-ownership constituted of codes, bodies, and institutions; of assets, property, and resources; of positions, powers, and revenues. A common patrimony, cultural, economic and experiential, to be cared for in solidarity and enjoyed equally.

This can occur simultaneously, if that specific part of the res publica allows it: as in the case of a public garden. Or by succeeding one another pro tempore: as is necessary for a public position, power, or role. All to maintain the ownership of the asset in the hands of the People.

Democracy is a harmonious and serene society, standing in stark contrast to the resentful and conflict-ridden mass of tyranny, be it empire, monarchy, or whatever else.

Under tyranny, the People are passive and subjected to the few who permanently hold central power. In Democracy, citizens can access the nucleus of the societal cell, the Republic, through an Institute, which we may call the Public Jobs Bank or by another name, that periodically redistributes roles based on competence, suitability, and preparation, as well as the needs of the Country.

Anyone can contribute to the Republic and become the architect of their own destiny. Society thrives by embracing a broad, collective vision, enriched by every individual, enabling it to seize opportunities and overcome obstacles.

In summary: one lives in a Democracy if the People enjoy a Republic. If there exists a Public Jobs Bank, in which anyone can register and reserve a place to contribute, that enables the periodic, regular renewal of the personnel managing public affairs.

If this Institute is not in force, then both "democracy" and "republic," though declared, though brandished, though vaunted, are fictitious. These are forms kept confused, intermediate, spurious, by those who, enjoying undue privileges inherited from the past, do not wish to renounce them and employ every agency and means at their disposal, primarily educational and informational ones, to keep the People ignorant and unrefined, hence in a state of subjugation.

So let us open the Public Jobs Bank and we get

The REPUBLIC of FULFILLED MEANING
